Man accused of voting in NH, Massachusetts

It's the state's first conviction through the Interstate Voter Registration Crosscheck Program, which identifies voters who may have registered or voted in more than one state.

Officials with the attorney general's office said McKinnon mailed an absentee ballot in October 2016 in Dracut, Massachusetts, stating it was his hometown, but two days later, signed a voter registration form in Durham.

As part of his six-month suspended sentence, McKinnon can no longer vote in New Hampshire and must complete 200 hours of community service.

David Campbell's journey to being a new homeowner hasn't been easy.

The U.S. Army veteran's home was destroyed in an April 13 tornado that hit Seneca, South Carolina.

Since then, Campbell has lived in hotel rooms and friends' houses.

"It's been stressful," he said.

Then, Purple Heart Homes stepped in to help turn things around.

"After the tornado hit, we realized that we might be able to help some veterans that maybe lost everything," said Larry Druffel, founding chairman of the Purple Heart Homes Golden Corner Chapter.

The organization agreed to provide Campbell a tiny home as "a way to express our gratitude for what veterans have done for us," Druffel said.

Campbell watched as construction crews arrived to build his new beginning.

"Today is the day they set it on the foundation," he said. "It's actually happening. It's a great day."
